The Wuhu correspondent of the Shenpao complains in strong language of an alleged rape committed by some German man-ofwar's mon on a woman at a place called Chi-wos. In explanation he says there were six sailors present on that day, two of whom carried the woman by force into the house, while the other four staid at the door of the house to keep watch. Just then the husband of the woman appeared on the scene, and seeing how things stood was filled with great rage, and immediately set upon the sailors guarding the door, calling upon his neighbours in the meanwhile to help him. An answer from the British Consul the next day, however, explained that the gunboat on board of which were the sailors accused of the outrage, was a German vessel and so beyond the jurisdiction of the British Authorities, and that, moreover, the said vessel had left Wuhn that morning. The Consul, however, kindly said that he would write to the captain of the German gunboat short the matter, and also promised to acquaint the German Consul General at Shanghei and request that official to investigate the alleged outrage. This courtesy on the part of the British Consul is much tries, while on the other hand, a feeling much the reverse is entertained by the people of Wuhu against the perpetrators of the alleged deed and much sympathy is felt toward the poor victim.
